Sociologists point out that gender is a social construct: that is, one’s gender does not need to correspond to one’s biological sex—but there are strong social pressures to act in particular ways based on one’s sex. The powerful force that gender exerts on us is especially visible when one considers interactions between adults and infants.

Applying Symbolic Interaction Theory to Race and Gender

Biologists' problems with race are magnified out of all proportion by the well-meaning public-policy attempts to categorize people by 'ethnicity'—understood to be a polite term for the otherwise taboo word 'race'. In the UK, one is routinely asked to classify oneself by a bizarre mixture of skin colour, geographical ancestry and nationality.

As with race, gender plays a large role in education. According to the UNESCO Institute of Statistics, 31 million girls of primary school age do not attend school and 17 million of these girls will probably never attend school in their lifetimes. We must continue to advocate for the right of girls to go to school, because when girls are educated, they are less likely to live in poverty.
